Politics does not seek the interests of oneself, but the interests of the people. The affluence of people's lives always asks whether or not there is political effort. There can be no nation because of the rebellion of the people.

These are the determinations for a complete transformation of the nation. These are the only revolutionary uprisings in the need for the people to be given their lives and self.

Your country has itself with the countries of the world. The self cannot be separated from the world.

These cataclysms are what politics realizes its determination.

A sublime ideal is different from a mess of self-interest. The people are always the foundation of the nation, and there can be no nation apart from it.

These are equal self-building with the world, that the people are given the same life.

If the determination surpasses all reality, politics can make it possible.
