

Comparative cultural studies

From the primitive world, civilization has a choice to the reality of intelligence. Because society has its compliance and rules. These are comparative cultural studies that compare self-progress in individual societies. The logic of the strong man is different from the monkey tribe embracing the strong man as the king. This is because the participation in nature in the monkey tribe is valued as strong and self-permanent. This is because the animal world does not get the lie and gets the law of nature. These are the worlds in the survival and food chain, with the domination in the intellect. Western civilization has a history of self-consideration and social construction. These allow the need and self-improvement to have a world with the freedom reality of choice, as well as to examine the reality. The world has its history, with a shift towards the advancement of intelligence, along with the value of ethics. They have a transformation from a primitive society to a new civilized society. The logic of the strong is the logic of nature, but in having the opportunity that the weak make himself, it gives the world its contradictions and conflicts. Intelligence creates new possibilities. This allows us to consider the modern era, along with the new technological revolution, toward the future. The East and the West give interesting insights. Because it has reality and society. Reality is never denied. Consideration of reality proves a comparison of cultures. All new creations are given in the West. This creativity exists in their social foundation of freedom. In the Orient, there is a denial of creativity. There is an affirmation of the existing society and a denial of creativity. These are the rise and fall of civilization, which has a future in reality and people's choices.
