Civilizations make it possible to construct society and life in their own independence. In this sense, the East and the West are two civilizations. I believe it is correct that the reality that is said to be other civilizations is derived from these.

This recognizes that the difference between the West, which has its roots in Egypt, and the East, which has developed its own civilization, is the reality of the world.

These, along with racial differences, can be judged to be the two poles that make up the world.

The exchange of civilizations gives the homogenization of all realities in the world, but its fundamentality gives it its differences.

The mestizo South American civilization was absorbed by the West, and Indian civilization lost its independence under British rule.

The clash of civilizations is not necessarily affirmed. There is a conflict of power.

All people desire a better reality and future. This is the truth of globalization.

Civilizations are clearly great. The meaning of having one's own world is that one has one's own independence.

Living in one's differences is a wealth, and therefore dialogue and cooperation among civilizations can give the world greater meaning and value than anything else.
