Proposals for financial changes in providing livelihoods to vulnerable Peoples and basic livelihoods in the poor

KURODA International Foundation

Takeshi Kuroda

Reducing livelihood financial assistance and increasing tax revenues prove that new social development in basic income, social participation, and improving the working environment will provide significant financial improvements, and we believe that political action is needed for these.

Social development in these share economies enables the construction of a new society in symbiosis, and we believe that political access to the corporate environment can realize its synergistic effect in the development of cooperative relationships.

These prove that the new core social infrastructure in the IOT enables the creation of a new society, and that the creation of the future is actually possible.

These new social systems can build a society in the sharing of new lives.

These prove that poverty can be resolved by political consensus, and that social sharing can realize new social construction as well as development at the cutting edge of the times.
