

Authoritarianism and the masses

July 7th, 2024

KURODA International Consulting

Takeshi Kuroda

Power always has a reality, along with its demands, but the masses always rebel against it.

Power may accumulate wealth and desires and seem to possess the world. However, the masses are more than merely recipients of this power. They actively strive to realize their ideals, fueling the conflict.

The conflict between power and the masses is a great topic for reflection and debate. Someone has to provide the answers.

Revolution is a reality among the powerful and the masses. If authoritarianism possessed the world, what might be their next decision?

Power makes people blind. So we must find a solution to this matter.

The definition of the masses is the most significant consideration.

What if these realities were reconciled?

Power and the masses have always been at odds throughout history. Power seeks more power, while the masses embrace ideals.

All these different parts of reality contain different cultural realities possessed by each.

Finding and seeing all history is too interesting to consider both. And if we find in the future, there are the same realities we may find within.

The conclusion is that power and the masses are different races.