

Competition and progress

July 23rd, 2024

KURODA International Consulting

Takeshi Kuroda

Competition in a liberal economy is the driving force that brings about progress in products and services. However, one can question whether competition brings about this progress. This is the same as the reality of war bringing about progress.

These are the realities of a liberal society.

On the other hand, competition brings about conflict.

This is a world of new agreements, of coexistence, that abandons competition and conflict based on survival and seeks new rules and agreements.

These are the perpetuation of the reality of the primitive in the absoluteness and necessity of survival, and the choice of a new civilization can propose a world based on new agreements and foundations from these survival bases.

These can propose a change from the competition cycle and progress to a new cycle of symbiosis and coexistence.

These are new proposals for a new socialism and propose the creation of a future under new rules.

However, the absolute demand for freedom denies its negation. Therefore, we seek the proposal of a new socialism, a new social system that allows all freedoms.

Competition always creates conflict and conflict. That is the principle of desire.