These are any realities of the world, which we may not ask for at the Davos conference but any argument of international society.

These are both sides of the world where we may have all our choices.

But we have chosen our consciences to try to make new international principles.

Liberalism and humanism are all principles of the world. But when we seek for the future, we may find a new idea for the world.

All these are our visions: a world free of poverty and where politics are accountable to the people.

The progress of academics and technologies guarantees all new possibilities, guaranteeing a new world with any improvement in efficiency and productivity.

If all academics make everything possible, we have all new academic progress.

New international principles may require all new agreements, from conflict to the unification of all realities.

All these ask for their basis of conscience to recreate the world differently.

All these new worlds may not be forced under any powers, but all ideals of liberalism ask their volunteers to a world.

If all people are given their choice of the world, what agreement can we offer them?

Therefore, politicians must make no mistakes in their decisions, as we are trying to gather the agreement of all people.
