Profit is the engine all enterprises make their business. That creates competition in the global market.

But seeking profit makes all businesses need clarification. We need morals for a new rule.

Capitalism reaches itself at the end by seeking profit. These are the reality we have in the world. Free trade systems protect these realities.

On the other hand, we see responsibility. Businesses have a responsibility for all lifelines.

This is where faith in a free economic system becomes contradictory. Interest and responsibility are contradictory. This requires clear judgment regarding the purpose of the company.

All these are the questions for business rules because they are responsible for society and life.

But we see profit and competition in a reality. And these give progress in a reality. That must be a reason we do not doubt the existence of reality.

New socialism and basic income could ask for changes in reality. These are questions of economic self-definition. The economy's obligation to support life and society differs entirely from pursuing profit.

These could be the doubt to reconstruct the world under new systems. We may try for a new world under fairness and agreement.

And we see philosophy could base the new world. These are the progress of academics and the wisdom of humankind.

And politics has a decision to make a new world.
