

Inequality and the Principle of Competition

November 22nd, 2024

KURODA International Consulting LLC

Takeshi Kuroda

Inequality grows under the Principle of Competition as we insist on a new socialism, which may reject all these inequalities but guarantee all livelihoods.

These are any proposal for all political consensus which we have proposed unification of the whole of Asia.

We can see that the new social system may be contained not only by some competition but also by new rules of society and economies.

All these are new principles and philosophies based on all reality we may follow with the use of technology in the future.

Liberalism and competition define the reality of today's world, but as we seek a new world, we try to share and agree on new world systems.

These are proposals for the unification of Asia with new social systems. We dare to use all technologies to rebuild new societies and develop regions.

As history nears its end, Capitalism only permits the occupation of the world. So, new economic systems, including digital financial systems, may compromise the fairness of economies.

A new education and social system with a new livelihood may not ask for any competition but the progress of academic and new relations with the universe as participating as a new member of theirs.

Without a doubt, politics must lead them all and realize all new promises with the regions.

These are all our proposals to the world under new philosophies, which should not contain any competition but ask for all new progress in realities.