

Iran war

March 21st, 2026

KURODA International Consulting LLC

Takeshi Kuroda

How did Iran lose its military forces? We need to know how much they have spent with them.

We must understand that these measures do not provide a realistic means of self-defense other than the development of a military force according to next-generation standards.

These military developments demand independent development. This is how self-defense is built.

These countries must understand that they are required to immediately and completely transform their military infrastructure and build a military that is highly practical.

The current military capabilities are completely impractical, as should be fully understood in the Iran War. When the military seeks practicality, it must seek practicality in its systems and weapons.

What must be clearly understood is that all the money spent on military expenditures is destroyed in a single day.

These perspectives require an understanding that when building a nation's military, the only option is to prioritize practicality in its systems, consensus-building, and weapons development.

These people must understand that the global balance of power has completely collapsed. Nuclear weapons are the last line of defense, and it is true that they provide the foundation for self-defense.

These realities of power are the only realities in diplomacy and security, and it is impossible to deny them and seek participation in the world. These realities mean that when a country seeks independence, it must understand that this option simply does not exist.