

Judgment of Reality and Creation of a New World on the Criterion of Motivation

KURODA International Consulting

Takeshi Kuroda

Motivation is given in government, and it has given the rise and fall of all civilizations in the past. This means that the reality of war and competition has a history as a source. The survival-based past overcomes survival in today's new technological civilization and contradicts the motivations of competition and pecuniary. But the right will seek the world at its source of hope.

Since everything is motivated by motivation, the formation of correct motivation is the proper form of politics.

These are the proposals for creating a new world, the correct judgments on reality.

They propose new world domination in intelligence progress, where survival instincts and animality dominate reality. These are creations in the intellect capable of forming a just world.

These are new proposals of new socialism against capitalism and the principle of competition that dominate reality. Constructing a new social system that denies the source of motivation called competition will realize a world of people's new hopes based on a basic income. This means that liberalism faces a new future in maturity.

These worlds offer to give a future to all people, and the formation of these right intentions can surely realize the creation of a proper world.

In contrast to the past, which is equally dominated by survival instinct, the intellect gains the creation of a new world, and these are certainly new hopes for the future.

If survival instinct and fear give war, then peace and hope can bring about a new world in its progress.

All children have a future. That desire is right in children. This understanding can explore new worlds.