

Reconsidering for the death penalty

Kuroda International

Takeshi Kuroda

The fact that social order is absolutely regarded and the death penalty is affirmed that clearly a harmful effect of the old age. Concurrentness in humanity and the world demand a legal system aimed at self-correction.

These require a clear judgment in the Supreme Court decision as to whether the rights are granted by the nation, or are humanely possessed by the individual, or whether the nation has the right to take the life of the individual. ..

Social order is regarded as absolute, and it is necessary to make a correct judgment as to whether the death penalty is tolerated and whether the purpose is to protect society and individuals in humanitarian judgment.

It is also an issue whether the law protects individuals or society.

Also, if the state has responsibility for the life of an individual, it can claim responsibility for crime.

It is possible to ask whether the state has responsibility for these self-development and growth, and the formation of a correct and healthy society, or whether these are required for individual responsibility.

Building a humanitarian society clearly requires the right judgment on these. On the other hand, there is an inhumane society.
