

Liberalism and competition

KURODA International Consulting

Takeshi Kuroda

Liberalism and competition are the laws of the world. According to all these realities, all people follow all new trends and ask any reality of the self.

All these are the law of nature and the perpetuation of the struggle for existence. So, if we ask for any progress, we may find a new world.

For all remarks we need to know, competition is a law of all reality. And it causes all social problems.

So if we find that liberalism and new socialism make it instead of competition, we see all differences of all realities.

As we can find the reality and rules of survival in the ecosystem and the absoluteness of past wars and survival that extend from them, we can propose a shift toward a new future in intelligence and reason. All these are the hierarchy, but we may have another idea if we find all reality calculations.

All these are definite questions and doubts against the free economic system of Chicago schools.

Liberalism and competition are all bases of the United States of America. And it is their justice. This is an American way of life. But we could find those who failed in reality called socially vulnerable.

New socialism based on basic income may serve all equal opportunities for people. And we could reconstruct society and lives.

As we can see, the competition is governed by Pax Americana. We know all elite, but on the other hand, there are those who failed the world. Instead, we insist on new socialism for all new world bases. And we expect all unification of the world.