

Liberalism and its hierarchy

May 18th, 2024

Kuroda International Consulting

Takeshi Kuroda

Liberalism permits one to seek life and the future without invasion from others. This must attract any people who are seeking the future.

On the other hand, the future must be forced from others, even if others steal it.

The diverse philosophies that shape our societies are a testament to the richness of human thought. However, it is crucial to recognize that exploiting these differences can lead to detrimental outcomes, a lesson we must all heed.

However, it contains competition under the survival principle that causes hierarchy.

Consider, for instance, the concept of self-exploitation within the realm of authoritarianism. This notion found its place in the French Revolution, where all citizens fervently advocated for freedom, often at the cost of their own well-being.

Amidst these complex circumstances, the concept of humanism emerges as a counterbalance. It stands on the other side of the self, enveloping the world we inhabit today.

Liberalism and the survival principle contain any reality we find in a world. They are the dynamism of reality we invest ourselves in.

Instead, we can find new social and world systems. We must first find that the survival requirement must be conquered to reach the future systems.

These may not be from survival principles but any reaction of possibility under the progress of intelligence.

New socialism is based on the coming future and the new creation of all intelligence. The base of new philosophy causes new world systems in any field.