

The Progress by competition principle

May 17th, 2024

Kuroda International Consulting

Takeshi Kuroda

Competition is the bedrock of our reality, driving progress and leaving no room for doubt about its significance.

But we must know all these realities are based on the survival principle as we see that any wars in the past are based on the same.

But competition must ask for conflict. And we can dream of a world without competition.

The prize of the USA is victory in this consensus. And we may know that a world without competition must have all similarities to the song by Imagine by John Lennon.

New socialism, a paradigm shift from the competitive society we know, envisions a world where basic income is a fundamental part of the social system. It's a concept that challenges the status quo and offers a new perspective on societal organization.

Under capitalism and free economic systems, competition is all based on a reality, and all measure is the amount of wealth as we see these possess the world itself.

Deeply considered, all these realities' survival requirements are based on competition, and it is a habit of all animals. Then humankind reached wisdom, as we see in Adam and Eve.

Wisdom may create reality, not make it addictive. Then, we may have new social and world systems for the new world.

Competition always creates a hierarchy. As we mentioned, competition is based on the survival principle. But if we conquer survival, which is always definite justice in history, we may find a new civilization and the future.

We always have a choice. We may not need to follow reality, but we can create the future.