

The absolute security of the economy

April 20th, 2024

Kuroda International Consulting

Takeshi Kuroda

Financial control owns the economy. This is the truth about globalization.

So, If we ask for national security, we need to build our financial system and independence of the economy.

These are demands for financial and industrial independence and self-reliance in the management of the state.

These demands for independent capital and construction in all industries are not just about self-reliance; they are about creating wealth that can elevate us to a position of equality with the world.

This means we need national economic policy based on all these consensuses and any basis of reality in the world.

We see technology in which all these industries have made a new society and life and built a military under any progress of technology, even with space technology itself.

And we need to argue about any capitals. Capitalism and world power politics have possession by capitals. We all know that, and it is any reality of the world.

To make domestic capital is the only permission we can ask for its independence and an equal position worldwide.

These economic infrastructures can be linked worldwide by requiring national policies to shift all industries to advanced production systems and significantly fostering knowledge-intensive industries.

These are the proper consensus of political decisions.

