

The collapse of communism and the free economic system

Kuroda International

Takeshi Kuroda

The collapse of communism is that social progress in the free economic system has destroyed the fixed reality of communism. The existence of a free society robbed it all.

The free economy's competitive principle has the difficulty of competition in reality and contrasts with Cuba's ideal communism.

This is liberalism, justice, and the present world exists. In truth, since the birth of the Beatles, this has been a revolutionary reality. Freedom allows all existence.

Communism has the ideal of equal distribution in itself. Liberalism idealizes infinite freedom in rights.

Under liberalism, ethical and social progress has the concept of responsibility. These are the sources of Western sociology and justice.

These have justice to the nation and reality in inhumanity. They form the world's public opinion and give the inventive step of academics and the construction and progress of truth in society, industry, and politics.

These realities of freedom are revolutions and proof that the 20th century was an American era. Also, note that they have a future.

The conflict between freedom and humanity creates present contradictions and confusion. This is because these ideals and reality, and ideas and reality have contradictions.

This is at the forefront of the times, with creating a new technological society based on the idea of freedom, which has one contradiction. The reality is the elite and the vulnerable.

These reinforce the illusion of freedom in the social system. Society has a self in life; rules and responsibilities are not always actual. I believe that this solid sword for the inhumanity of freedom cannot guarantee its victory.