

The reality of economy first and pursuit of affluence

Office of
KURODA International Consulting
Takeshi Kuroda

All purposes are based on the economy first due to the necessity of survival. It gives affluence of life but the lack of true demand.

The structure of exploitation in the economy creates wealth inequality and creates a wealth hierarchy for the economy instead of making the abundance of life.

The free economic system affirms these. But the domination by the economy is what gives the rule of wealth.

Under philosophical consideration, we doubt that economy could be a purpose. We may find that survival principles affirm them.

Capitalism allows ownership. That means wealth has control of the world.

But as we reach philosophy, we need to know all purposes of self and the necessity of the nation and the world. Then we find that survival and purpose make a difference among its realities.

What kind of future is possible if survival is guaranteed and the world shares new rules that are not about competition or the pursuit of wealth?

We are facing a new era that is opening the door to the universe. We may ask for a new system of society and nation, world.

An economy is a tool for serving people's life, not with competition but a new economic system with symbiosis.

The basic income option exists because wealth competition is a problem.