

Development model in developing countries

Kuroda International

Takeshi Kuroda

Development models in developing countries propose the construction of social and administrative, life in cutting-edge technologies and systems. These will foster self-industry in domestic demand, and improve domestic infrastructure with assistance from developed countries.

These will realize the construction of their own country through the development of human resources in the training. These are to realize infrastructure development and social system construction in the nation on the cutting-edge standard, and securing capital and nurturing in domestic demand can simultaneously improve the social infrastructure in the country.

These will be realized in the request for assistance and cooperation in the international community, and the improvement of the educational environment in the home country will build an independent national management in the future.

These points are to build a nation with the same standards as developed countries, and their technology and academic ability are required to develop human resources.

These can be realized in clear consensus and planning in politics.

Securing these capitals can always build the living and social environment of one's own country at its cutting edge in its planning and self-standards and vision in politics.