

National security

Takeshi Kuroda

National security has the need to agree on the absolute requirement of independence and to build itself in diplomacy and industrial development, the military.

Diplomacy seeks to participate in the current diplomacy of the free camp and the power principle in the construction of military treaties and the conclusion of peace treaties, in the non-conflict reconciliation based on its self-idea.

Security is obliged to maintain national independence and foster all industries in domestic demand. They seek bilateral and bilateral trade agreements and propose participation in shared rules as long as they do not infringe on their own interests.

These always ensure understanding and participation in the presence of the military world. Participation in these world politics requires the operation of one's own country in the collection and analysis of correct information, and is the only one that allows participation in reality.

These require the building of a clear political self-presence and the response to reality.

These are the only complete proofs that politics is the state's decision, and security is the correct proof that politics has the need for state management in self-independence.

National security in these industries and capital, military power and academic progress is the only choice for the state to seek its own permanence.
